
Coming full circle

Posted by Andreas - 2007/10/17 16:00

Hey folks,

this is a bit funny to realize.

I started off with leaving the environment that I was used to because I felt the urgent need to discover the world from a spiritual perspective. Lots of things occurred since then. Some seemed a bit mystic, some a bit prophetic, some exciting, calming, confusing and unsettling. The current process is getting all the bits and pieces together that have been thrown up in the mean time and get a proper picture of what service and surrendering means in practical terms. All is One, this is for certain, even on different levels of reality this is undeniable. But realizing that doesn't make you sit under a tree all day long and worship the almighty cosmos, it kicks a instead. A clearer picture of what to do emerges - a picture of what to do for the benefit of the people and nature involved. Pondering that question and having a closer look it seems as if it brings me exactly back to where I came from. Not necessarily the same surrounding, but the same mind-state.

This is just a snapshot of the current mind state, though and might change in an instant of one second, but it brings up some quotes that make sense now: "To be truly spiritual, it is best to forget about spirituality altogether." Mother Meera always advised the people asking her about how to lead a good life to simply live. "Just live", she says. That's it, the magic is within our existence.

...so if that is right - is there not more to explore? What about sitting in a cave for a couple of years and face inner daemons and bliss out for the rest of time?

Maybe the answer comes later. For now this is all I can share.

Thanks, folks!

Andreas

=====